Mirthful Mike's Manic Musings

Hello and welcome to The Art of Changing Breeds: A Visual Guide to the Fera. I am your host, "Mirthful" Mike Chaney. Please buckle up and keep your hands inside the ride as we embark upon a journey of artistic discovery (and butchered grammar).

Still with me? Good.

Unlike the previous "Art of" books that Onyx Path have done, I've opted to not put in the email exchanges between myself and the various artists. Why? That's easy, I talk in "dudespeak" much like all my artists. Let's be honest, do you really want to read a series of emails that read like this:

Me – DUDE! That Weretiger is awesome!

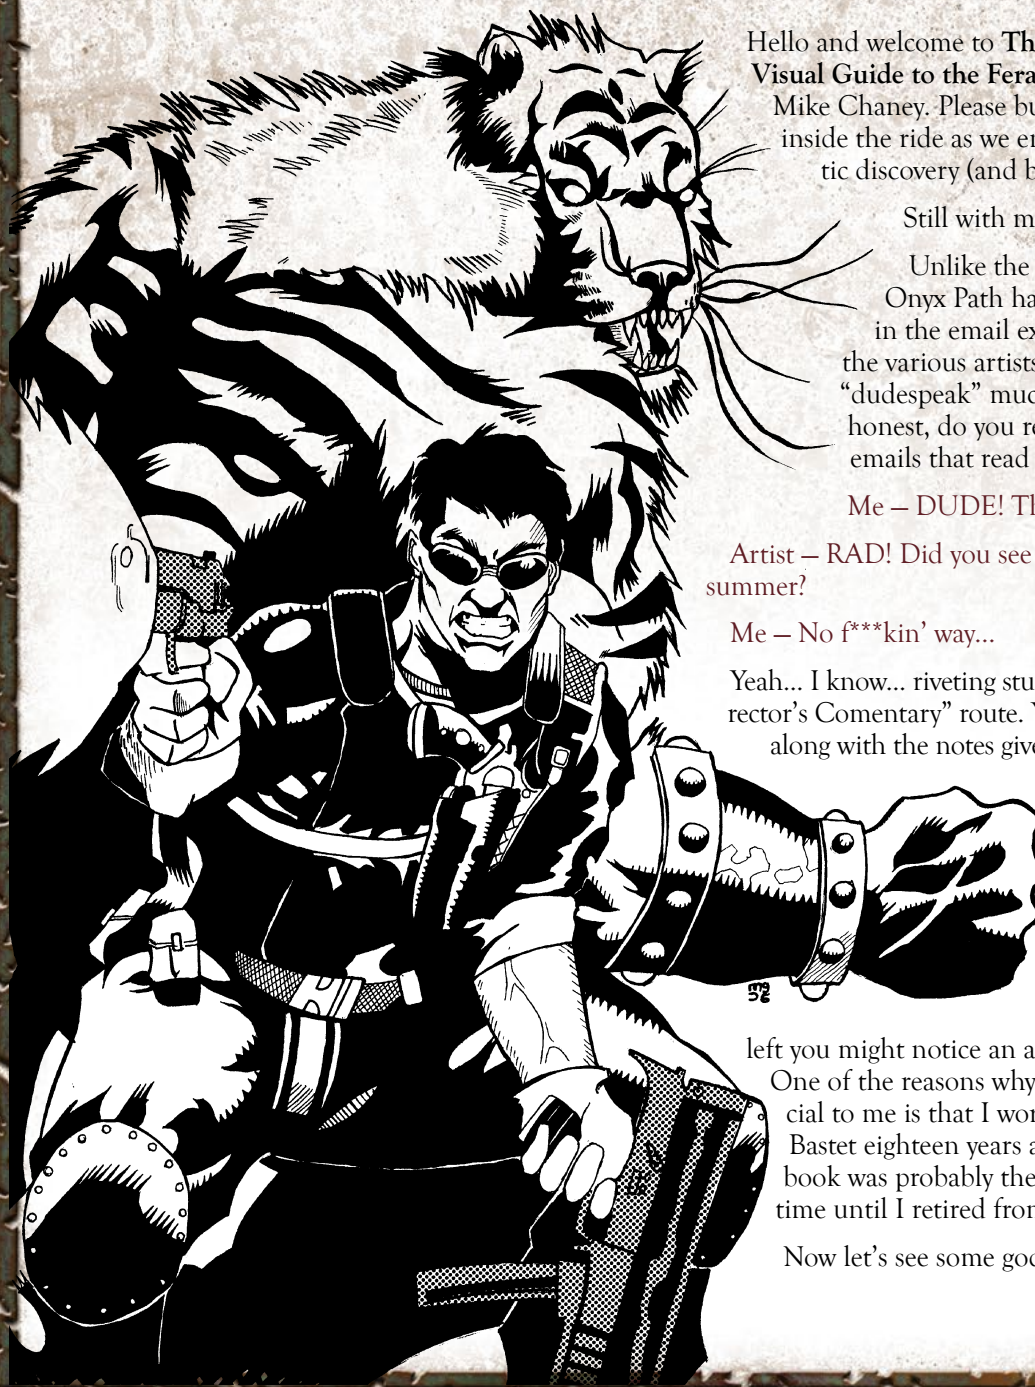

Artist – RAD! Did you see that Maiden is touring this summer?

Me – No fin' way...

Yeah... I know... riveting stuff. Instead, I've gone the "Director's Commentary" route. You'll see the initial sketches along with the notes given to the artists... and a little of the history between me and all the artists on the project. But most of all you'll see all the awesome artwork that the artists turned in and hopefully get a little peek into their artistic process.

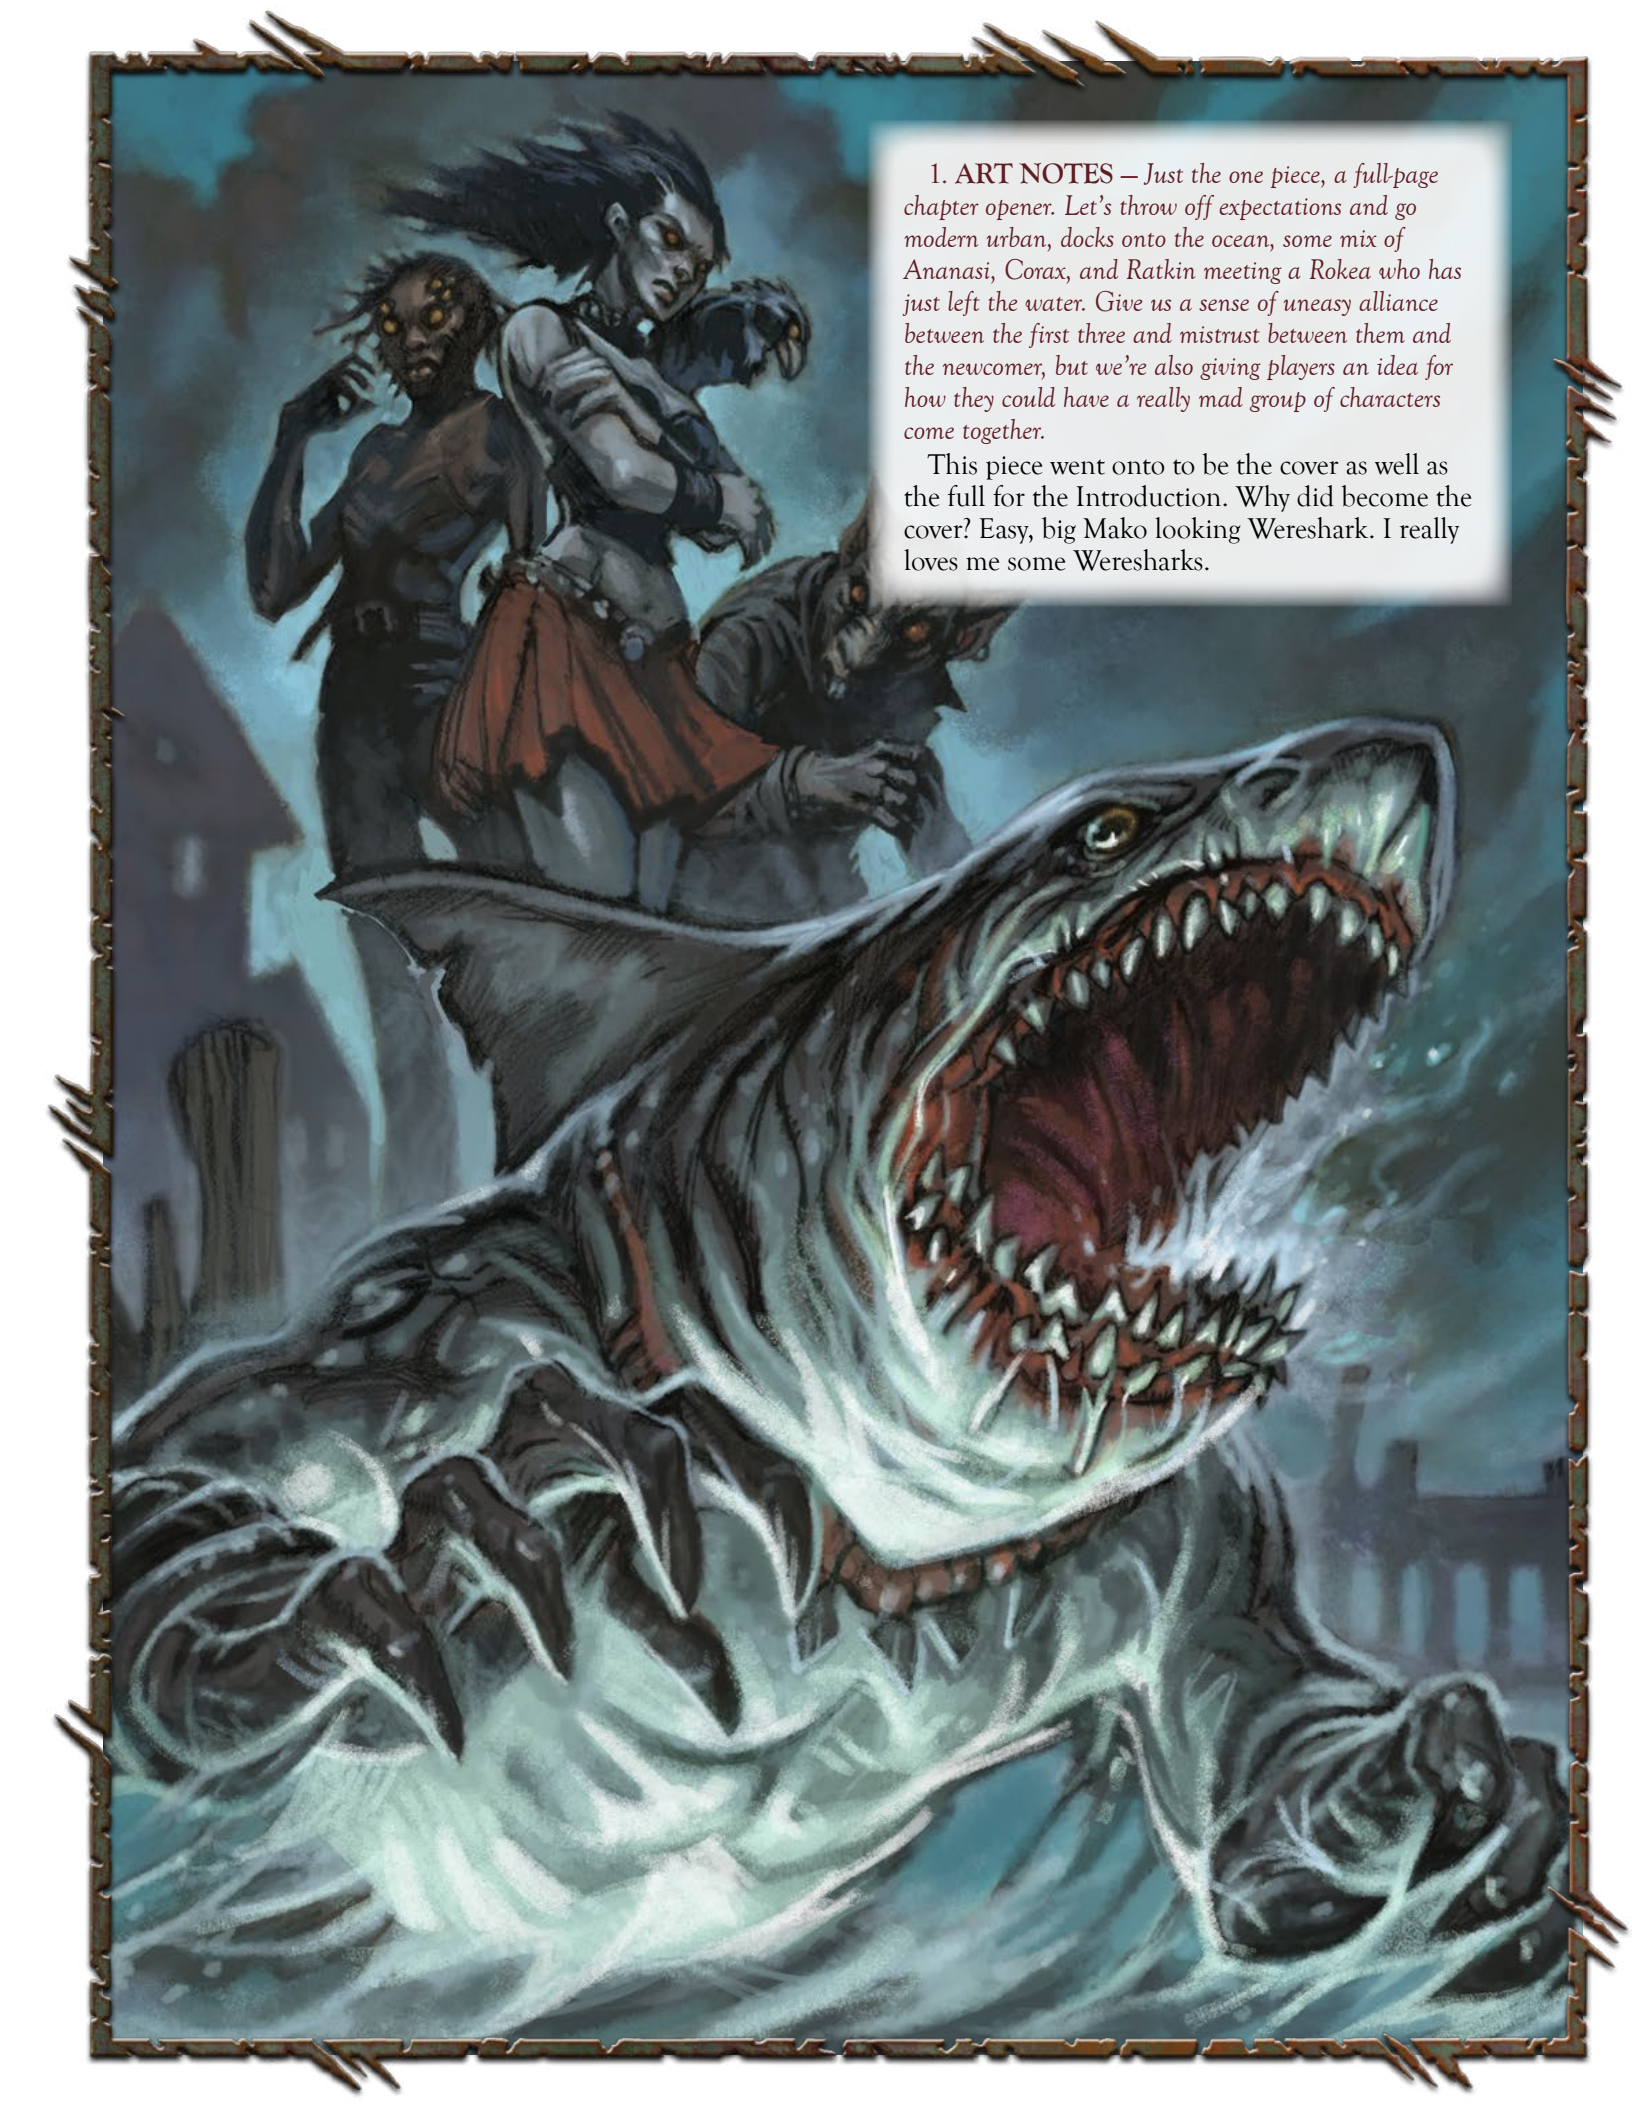

To start things off, to the left you might notice an artifact from the days of yore. One of the reasons why the Changing Breeds are special to me is that I worked on the first Breedbook... Bastet eighteen years ago. Also special because that book was probably the last book I turned art in on time until I retired from doing that racket in 2004.

Now let's see some goddamn Changing Breeds....

These are Steve Ellis' sketches for the full pages. Like many artists he starts out with rough thumbnail sketches to work out his composition and placement. The large piece above is his final "pencil" treatment before he moves onto color.

1. ART NOTES — Just the one piece, a full-page chapter opener. Let's throw off expectations and go modern urban, docks onto the ocean, some mix of Ananasi, Corax, and Ratkin meeting a Rokea who has just left the water. Give us a sense of uneasy alliance between the first three and mistrust between them and the newcomer, but we're also giving players an idea for how they could have a really mad group of characters come together.

This piece went onto to be the cover as well as the full for the Introduction. Why did become the cover? Easy, big Mako looking Wereshark. I really loves me some Weresharks.

2 ART NOTES — Chapter opener should invoke history. If we could get something that implies one of the Wars of Rage that'd be awesome. A fight scene somewhere in Central America between werewolves on one side, Mokolé and Balam on the other. Maybe a Camazotz dead at the werewolf's claws? Or is that going too far? Either way the events would be early-mid 16th Century, the werewolf would have arrived with the Conquistadors while the others are native to the area.

A dramatic illustration of a confrontation between a weretiger and a Mokolé in a temple. The weretiger, on the left, is a large, muscular creature with orange and black stripes, a white face, and a long tail. It is roaring with its mouth wide open, showing sharp teeth. The Mokolé, on the right, is a large, green, scaly creature with a wide, toothy grin and a long, curved horn. It is also roaring. In the background, a third creature, a dark, scaly beast with a long, curved horn, is perched on a ledge, looking down at the other two. The scene is set in a temple with stone walls and a large, arched doorway. The lighting is dramatic, with strong highlights and deep shadows.

3 ART NOTES — For the chapter opener, let's go with another group shot, this time somewhere in India. Confrontation between a Khan and a Mokolé who is guarding a Nagah, protecting something that to the weretiger's eyes is some new Wyrmb-beast.

I've worked with Steve on enough projects that when it calls for a battle scene, give him a little bit of direction and let him go nuts on it. Thus far, I haven't been disappointed with his results.

4. ART NOTES — Chapter opener should be a shot of the Apis and Grondr defending themselves from a Garou attack during the first War of Rage.

While the notes did request both an Apis and Grondr, I think the piece would have looked a bit crowded had Steve incorporated the Grondr. Like I said, the man knows how to paint a battle scene and I was not disappointed with the results.

5. ART NOTES — Another group-shot for our chapter opener. This time give it a Native American twist, a meeting between a Corax, a Nuwisha, a Gurahl, and a Pumonca. It's a tense meeting, they've all got a certain amount of respect for the others and nobody wants to be the one who fucks it up for the others.

Ajaba

One of the first things I do when tackling a big project like Changing Breeds is assemble a “brief” or “art bible” for artists to reference. For most of the fera, this was a pretty easy task as most of them either had a book in the 90’s or had a large section in another book (Kitsune). However, the poor Ajaba didn’t really have much in the way of artwork to use as reference. Luckily I had enough reference for new artist, Borja Puig Linares, to use for the form and iconic artwork. I was also lucky enough to have long time Werewolf artist and mustache enthusiast Jeff Holt on board to handle the gifts.

Ajaba
Iconic/temple

ART NOTES – Every Ajaba wears a small piece of metal that cover the base of the skull, as protection against an ancient curse. In human form they're mostly subSaharan African, Maasai and similar extraction.

Currently in the timeline the whole Breed are living as refugees cast out of their homeland, so they could be anywhere, but usually attached to African immigrant populations. Warriors and leaders tend to be women, who have an unrepentant “we do what must be done” kind of vibe.

This was Borja's first piece for Changing Breeds and I think he nailed it right out of the gate. The only real change between the sketch and the final was the head size as I thought it needed to be a tad larger. Other than that, didn't really need much else.

Borja spent time not only sketching out the forms, but the faces for each form as he wanted to get each one just right. That kind of attention to detail is what made his pieces truly stand out in this book.

Again, the only real adjustment was head sizing. Other than that, it's all Borja having fun with the piece.

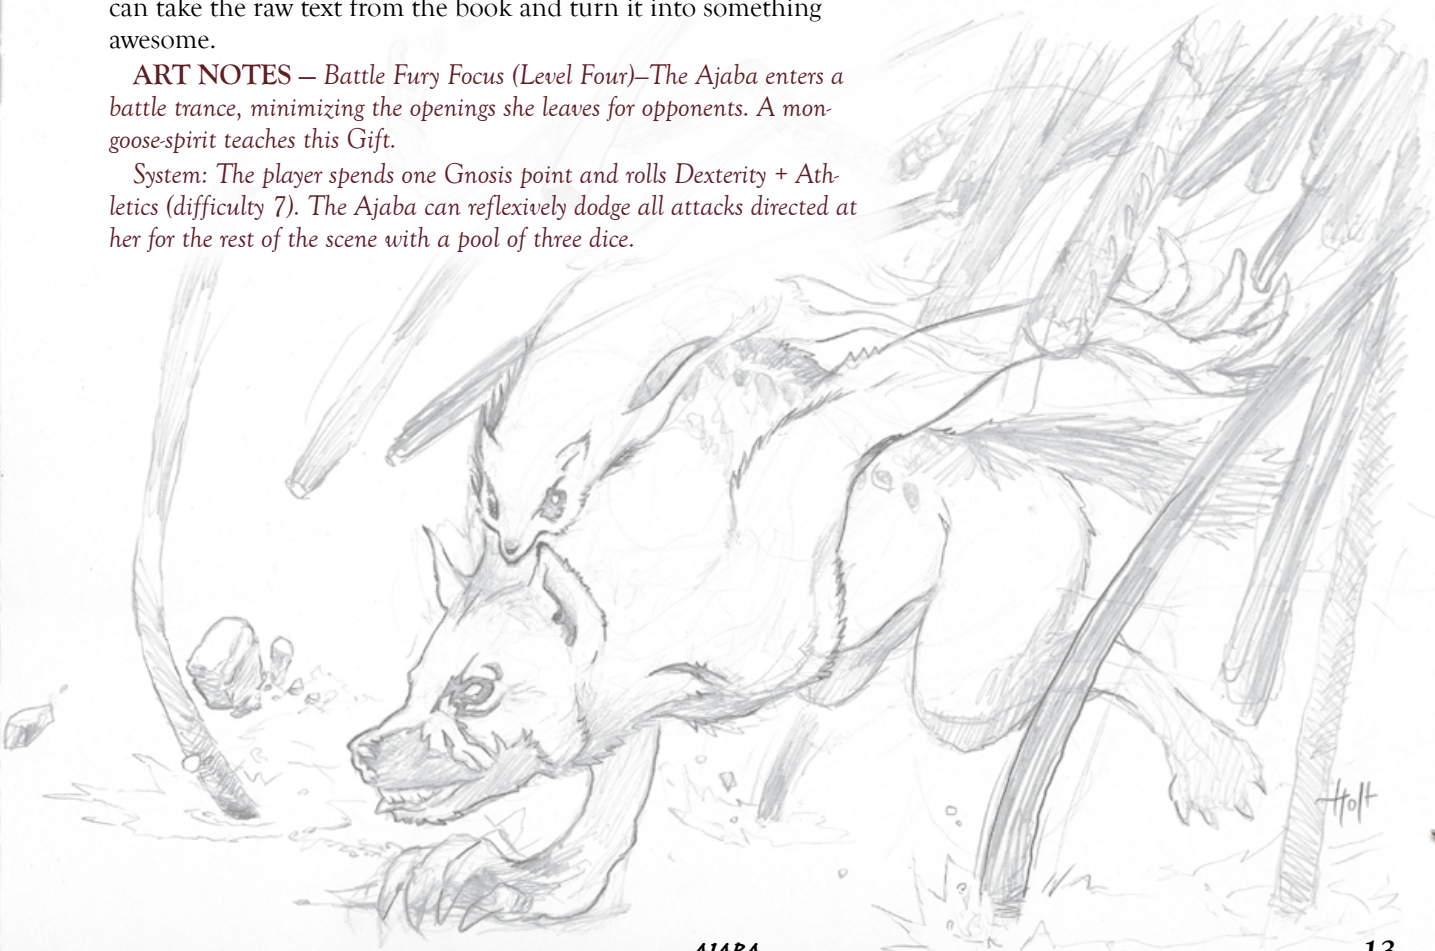

Many artists need detailed descriptions for each piece of artwork. However, Jeff Holt is one of those rare breeds of artists that can take the raw text from the book and turn it into something awesome.

ART NOTES — Battle Fury Focus (Level Four)—The Ajaba enters a battle trance, minimizing the openings she leaves for opponents. A mon-goose-spirit teaches this Gift.

System: The player spends one Gnosis point and rolls Dexterity + Athletics (difficulty 7). The Ajaba can reflexively dodge all attacks directed at her for the rest of the scene with a pool of three dice.

Another piece from Jeff featuring the Ajaba. This piece was from the Ahadi section.

ART NOTES — It was a task of years – and that does not even begin to describe the ordeal of sorting misappropriated fetishes, relics that had moved through so many hands that Kisasi secretly lamented having not sealed them away with the soul of the Tyrant Simba.

Ananasi

Original artwork by Steve Prescott from the Anasasi Breedbook. One of the many pieces used as reference for artists working on the Anasasi (also one of my favorite Prescott pieces).

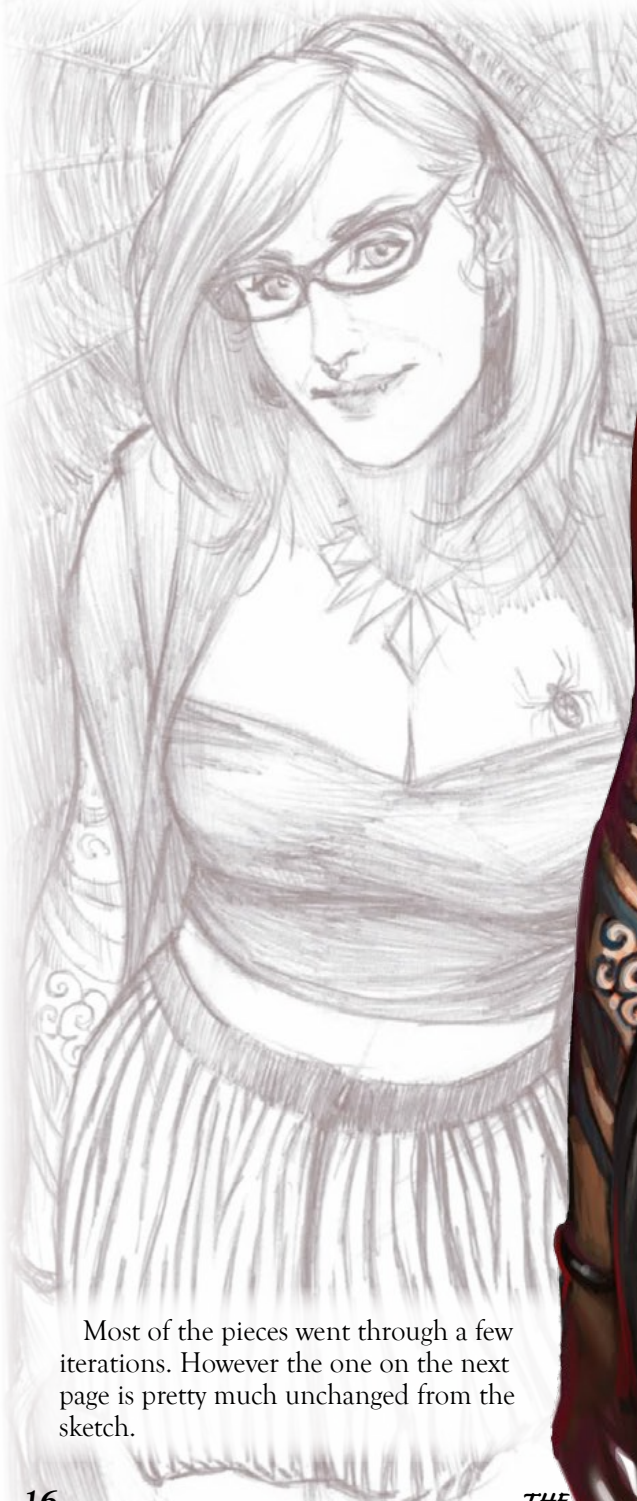

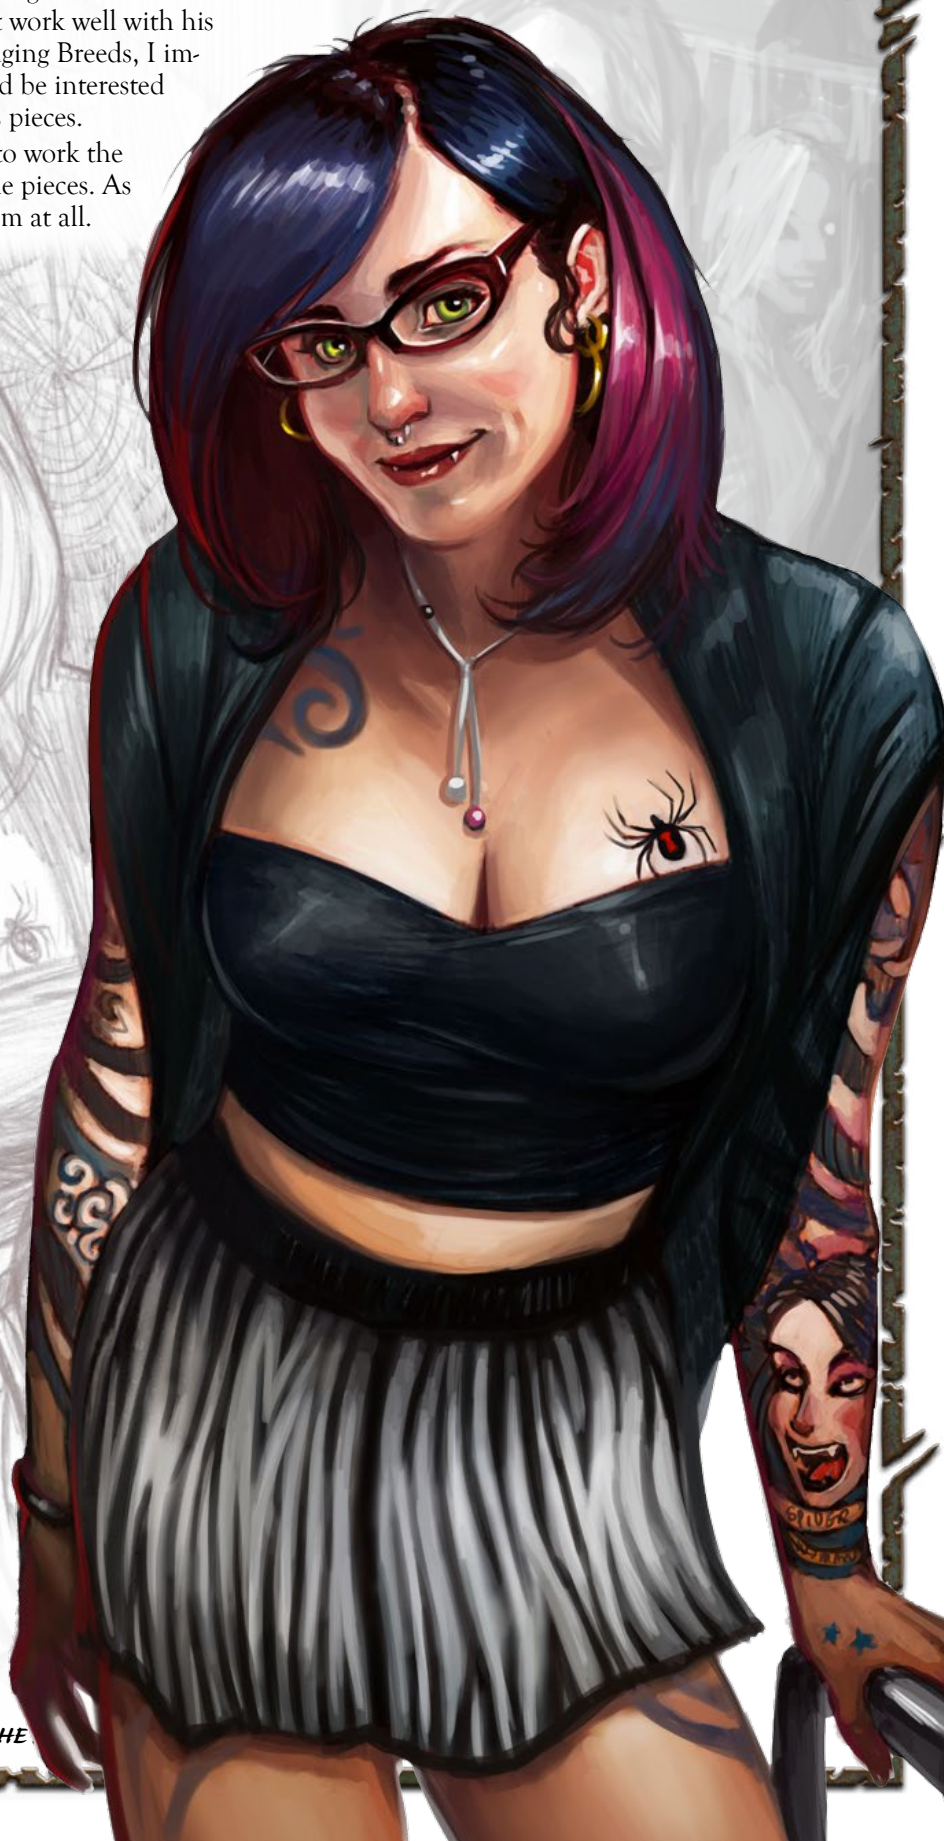

Initial Anasasi Iconic sketch from Efrem Palacios. This later changed as the iconic pieces needed to be single figure pieces rather than a scene.

I first worked with Efrem on WoD: Changing Breeds and went on to work with him over several book and a couple of expansions for Vampire the Eternal Struggle.

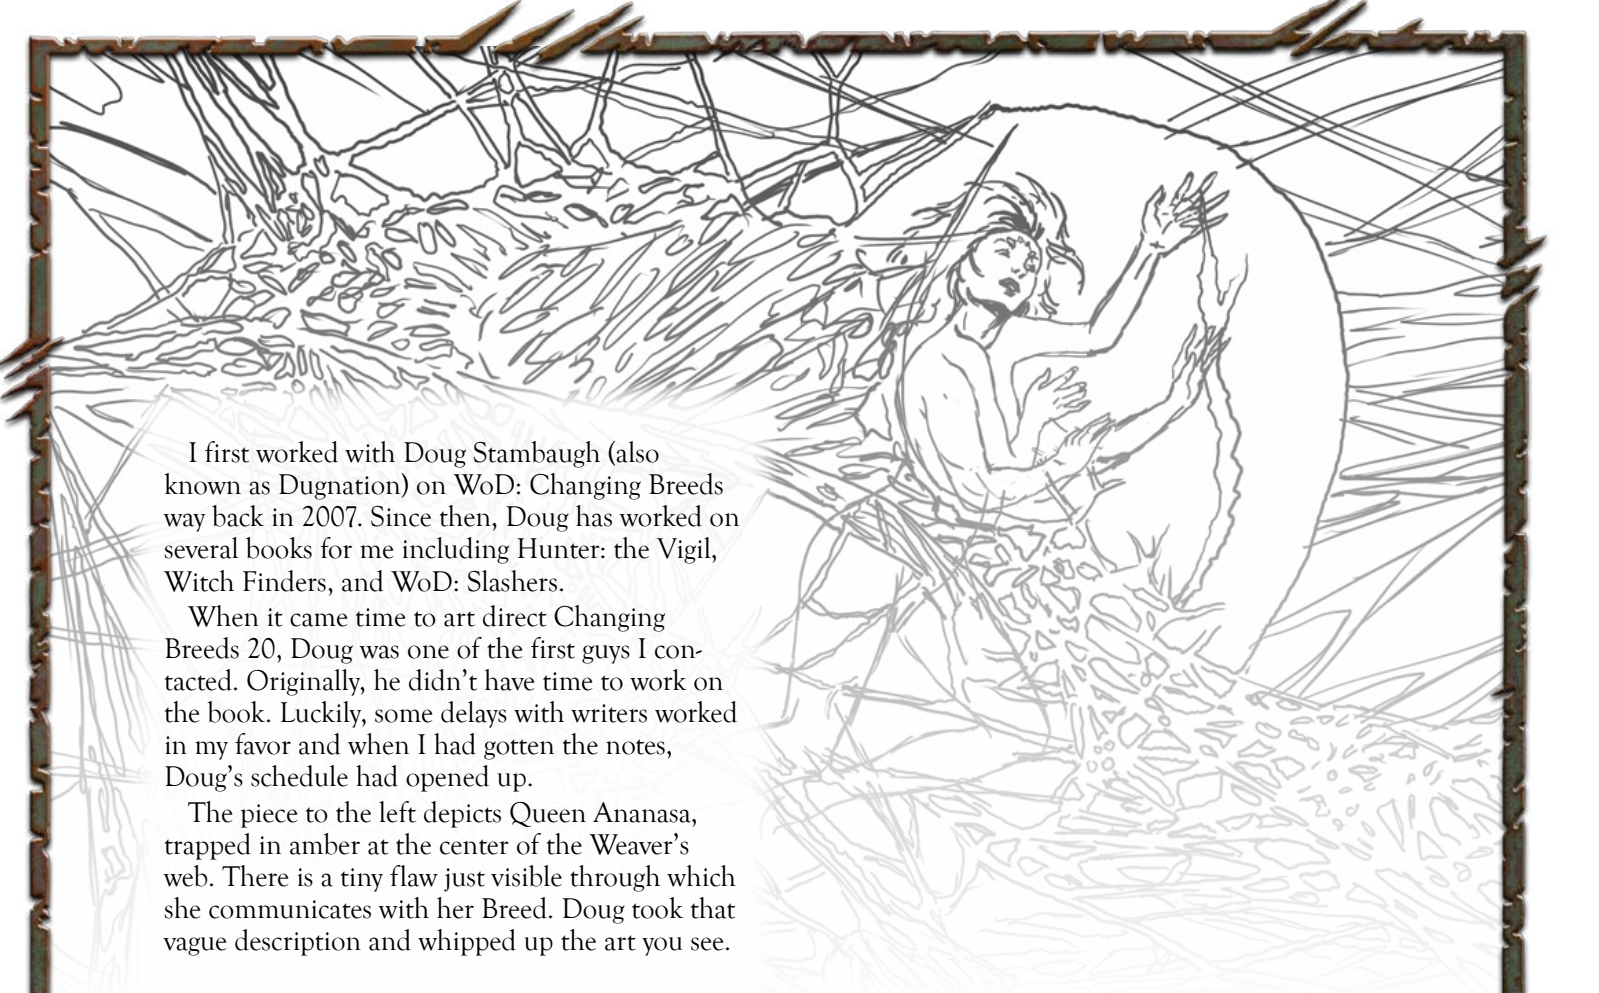

I had originally contacted Efrem about doing some artwork for The Hunters Hunted II but our deadlines didn't work well with his schedule. So, when I got the notes for Changing Breeds, I immediately contacted Efrem to see if he would be interested in painting up the Anasasi iconic and forms pieces.

To make things more interesting, he had to work the likeness of a W20 Kickstarter backer into the pieces. As you can see, it wasn't really a problem for him at all.

Most of the pieces went through a few iterations. However the one on the next page is pretty much unchanged from the sketch.

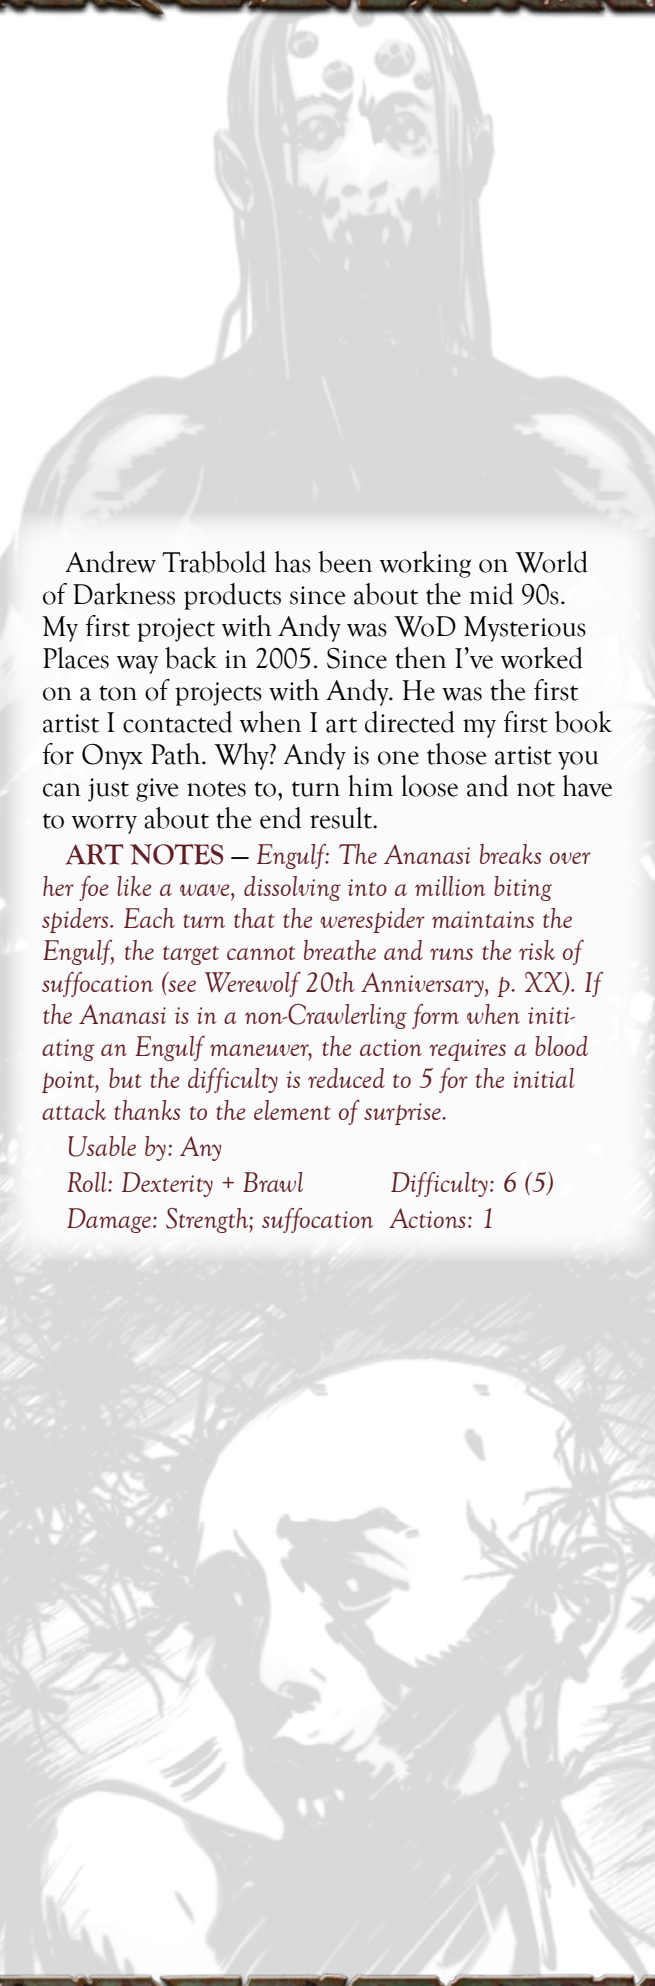

I first worked with Doug Stambaugh (also known as Dugnation) on WoD: Changing Breeds way back in 2007. Since then, Doug has worked on several books for me including Hunter: the Vigil, Witch Finders, and WoD: Slashers.

When it came time to art direct Changing Breeds 20, Doug was one of the first guys I contacted. Originally, he didn't have time to work on the book. Luckily, some delays with writers worked in my favor and when I had gotten the notes, Doug's schedule had opened up.

The piece to the left depicts Queen Ananasa, trapped in amber at the center of the Weaver's web. There is a tiny flaw just visible through which she communicates with her Breed. Doug took that vague description and whipped up the art you see.

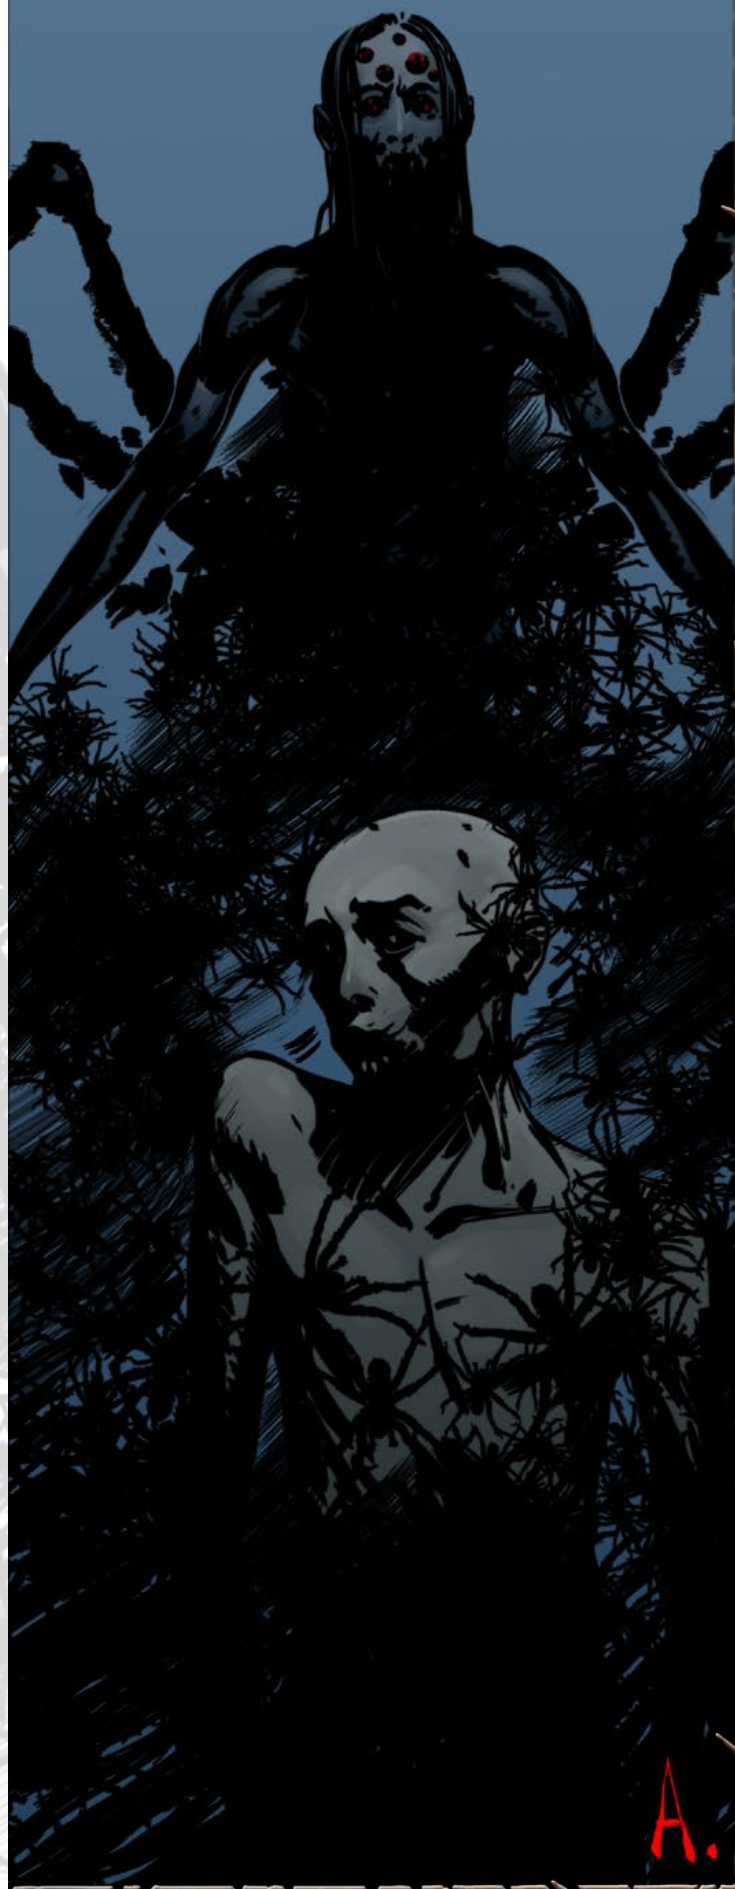

Andrew Trabbold has been working on World of Darkness products since about the mid 90s. My first project with Andy was WoD Mysterious Places way back in 2005. Since then I've worked on a ton of projects with Andy. He was the first artist I contacted when I art directed my first book for Onyx Path. Why? Andy is one those artist you can just give notes to, turn him loose and not have to worry about the end result.

ART NOTES — Engulf: The Ananasi breaks over her foe like a wave, dissolving into a million biting spiders. Each turn that the werespider maintains the Engulf, the target cannot breathe and runs the risk of suffocation (see Werewolf 20th Anniversary, p. XX). If the Ananasi is in a non-Crawlerling form when initiating an Engulf maneuver, the action requires a blood point, but the difficulty is reduced to 5 for the initial attack thanks to the element of surprise.

Usable by: Any

Roll: Dexterity + Brawl Difficulty: 6 (5)

Damage: Strength; suffocation Actions: 1

Bastet

The Bastet section proved to be a difficult one as we had to cover a lot of information in a very small amount of space. The Bastet had their own book back in the old days and it was a pretty hefty book when compared to the other Breedbooks.

The first thing I had to figure out was which kind of Bastet to feature for the iconic and forms pieces. Originally, the developer had asked for a Panther but that had been done once before on the back of the original Bastet book. I wanted something a little more exotic, hence the cheetah pieces to the left and on the opposite page. Sure, I could have gone with the Khan or the Simba... but I felt that was the easy way to go.

Once again, I called upon Borja Puig Linares to supply the artwork for the iconic and forms pieces (left and opposite page).

Blacktooth vs the Ajaba actually appeared in the Ahadi section of Changing Breeds 20, but I felt it was too cool not to show in the Bastet section. This piece was done by Tyler Windham, a former concept artist for the World of Darkness MMO.

Borja's initial finish for the Bastet forms. We had to have him make a slight alteration for the final piece that appeared in the book.

ART NOTES

Tribe Spread pt 1

This piece is a 2 pt piece. For pt 1 I'd like the group to consist of Balam, Bubasti, Ceilician, & Khan. Feel free to mix the various forms they are in, just make sure the Khan is in the full werecat mode and looking angry and roaring to the right.

② Atribe Spread

Simba full battle cat mode

Pumonxa

Qualmi

Tribe Spread pt 2

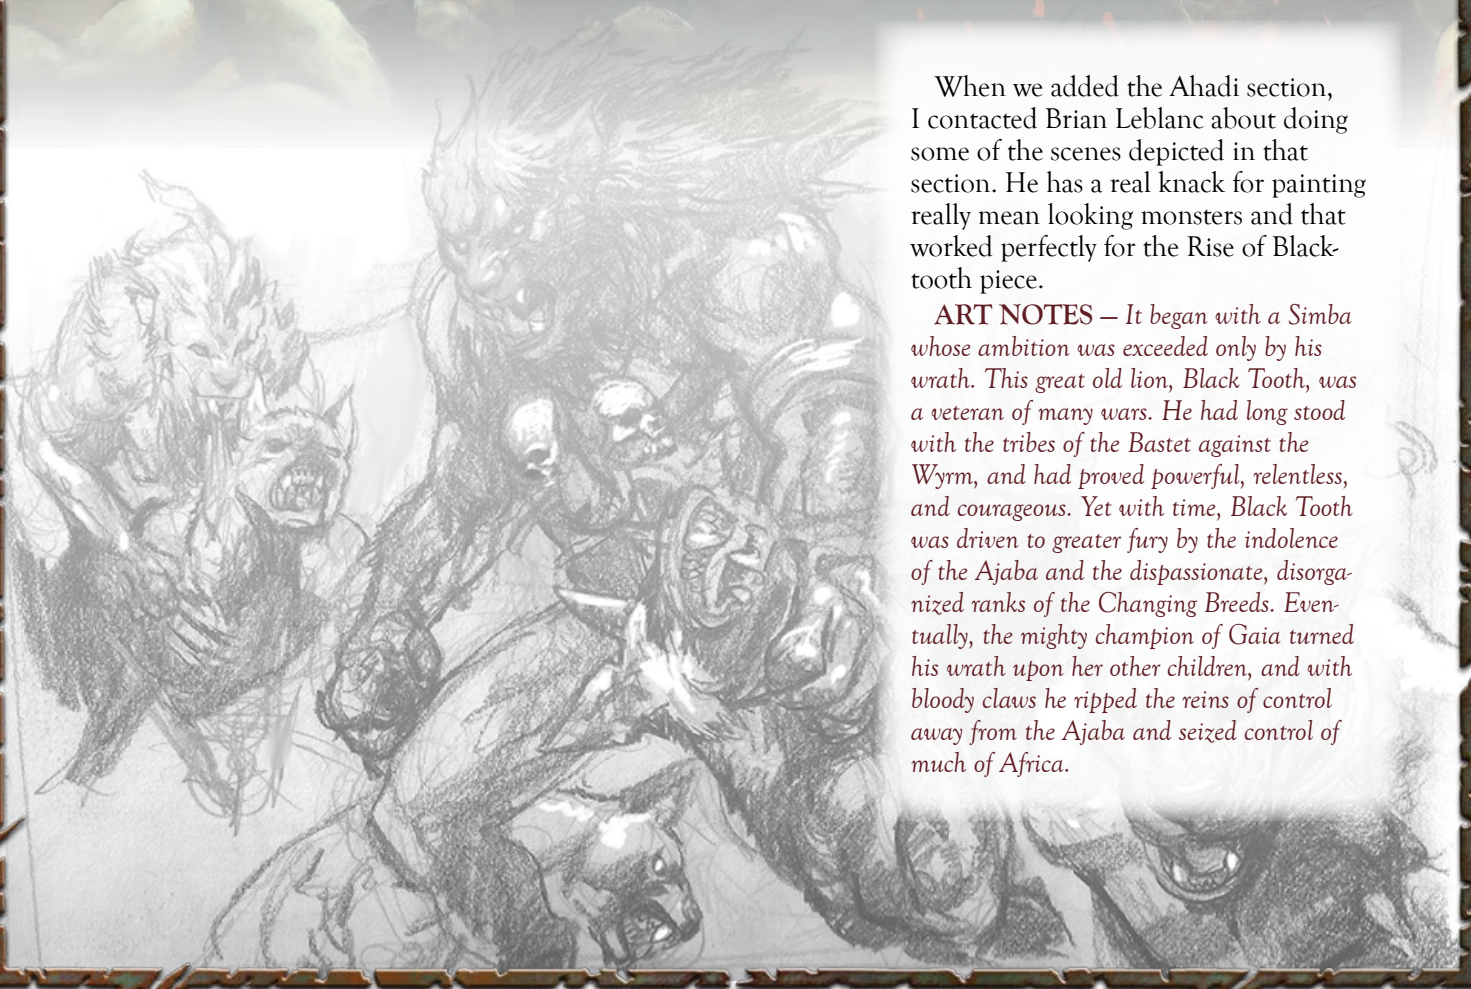

This is the other part of the above. This one should have the Pumonxa, Qualmi, and Simba. The Simba should be in full battle cat mode and be angrily roaring to the right. The idea is Khan and Simba cannot stand one another and they are constantly at one another's throats.

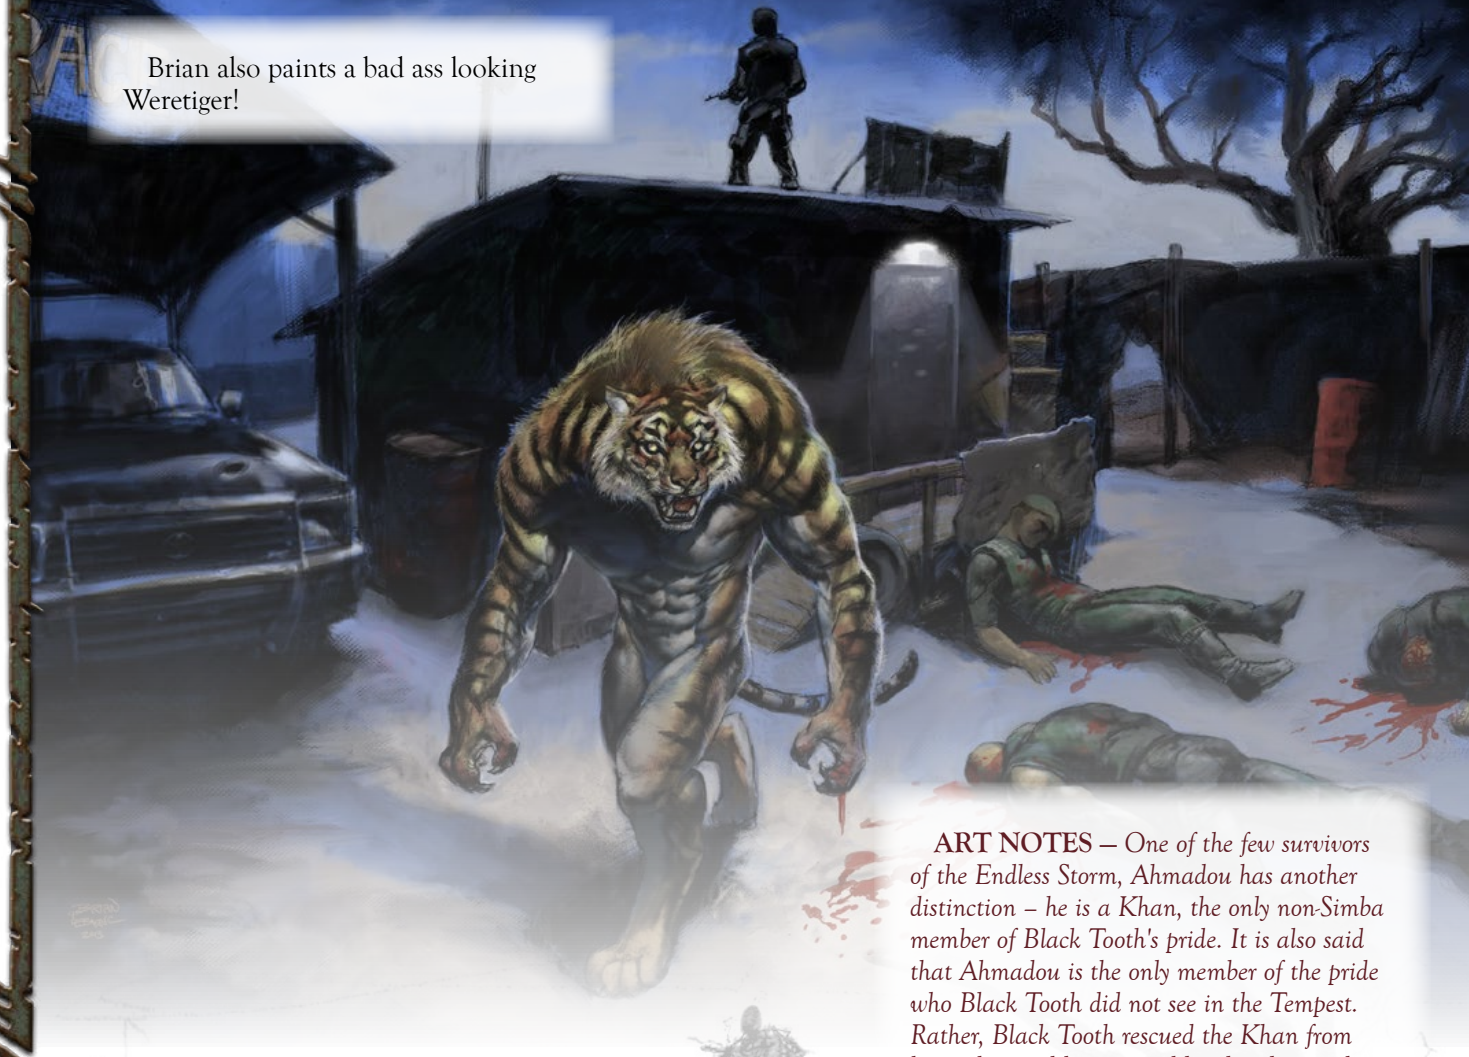

When we added the Ahadi section, I contacted Brian Leblanc about doing some of the scenes depicted in that section. He has a real knack for painting really mean looking monsters and that worked perfectly for the Rise of Blacktooth piece.

ART NOTES — It began with a Simba whose ambition was exceeded only by his wrath. This great old lion, Black Tooth, was a veteran of many wars. He had long stood with the tribes of the Bastet against the Wyrn, and had proved powerful, relentless, and courageous. Yet with time, Black Tooth was driven to greater fury by the indolence of the Ajaba and the dispassionate, disorganized ranks of the Changing Breeds. Eventually, the mighty champion of Gaia turned his wrath upon her other children, and with bloody claws he ripped the reins of control away from the Ajaba and seized control of much of Africa.

Brian also paints a bad ass looking Weretiger!

ART NOTES — One of the few survivors of the Endless Storm, Ahmadou has another distinction — he is a Khan, the only non-Simba member of Black Tooth's pride. It is also said that Ahmadou is the only member of the pride who Black Tooth did not see in the Tempest. Rather, Black Tooth rescued the Khan from being drowned by a crocodile when he was but a cub, and the young tiger followed him ever since.

Those who have faced him say that Ahmadou is the greatest fighter of the Endless Storm, even greater in physical combat than Black Tooth himself. The Khan is both feared and respected for his tremendous battle record. It is widely known that he lived through the final battle with Black Tooth and now stalks Africa with an unknown purpose.

Many fear Ahmadou will seek revenge for the death of Black Tooth, or try to rebuild his power. Those who know Ahmadou — chiefly his enemies, for he has no friends — scoff at the notion. In Ahmadou they see a valiant whose claws first seek the throat of the Wyrms, and then any foe worth slaying. In his endless quest to fight the Wyrms, Ahmadou has transcended Black Tooth's goals. Though he mourns the death of the Simba who was like a father to him, he did not fall prey to Black Tooth's corruption, and neither seeks to carry on his legacy, nor seeks to hound his killers and take revenge.

Borja's original sketch and finish for the Bastet "forms". As Changing Breeds was meant to have a more PG-13 presentation, I had to request he cover up the nude parts.

Corax

When I contacted John Bridges about doing some artwork for Changing Breeds 20, he specifically requested two of the Changing Breeds... Corax and Gurahl. John actually had a hand in the creation of the Corax many years ago and they've always been special to him.

TOP: Corax Forms by John Bridges.

RIGHT: Corax from the Hengeyokai section by Brian Leblanc.

Gurahl

Originally when I contacted John, he was intending to take on the Corax, Gurahl, and Nuwisha. However, he decided only to take on Corax and Gurahl in order to give those pieces the love and attention they needed.

ART NOTES — Big and outdoorsy even in human form, the stereotype look would either be lumberjack chic or similar garb—fundamentally practical for spending weeks or months living outdoors. Tend to be travellers. Four Tribes, mostly made up of four types of bear: Black, Brown, Grizzly, and Polar. They've got a role as healers and cleansers, so mostly a back-to-nature type look. They're not placid—a raging Gurahl can tear cars in two without much thought. But while werewolves are warriors, werebears are guardians.

Gurahl Iconic by John Bridges.

TOP: The Gurahl Forms by John Bridges.

BOTTOM: A Gurahl facing the Death Bear by Doug Stambaugh.

TYPOS CAN BE FUN!

The sketch and final you see here were brought to you by me hitting the “o” key instead of the “e” key. Thus a Wereboar confronts the Death Bear.

Luckily, Dough was a good sport about the whole thing and changed the Wereboar into a Werebear.

Kitsune

Ah the Kitsune. The other Fera that didn't get their own book (I think they got tagged onto the back of Heng-eyokai). The Kitsune were probably the ones that gave me the most trouble as far as choosing the right artist. I didn't want to go with the "easy kill" and get a very anime influenced artist for this chapter as it wouldn't have fit in with the overall feel of the book.

Then I happened to see the artwork of Tomek Tworek in a Deadlands book. I messaged my buddy and sometimes partner in crime Aaron Acevedo about who the artist was and could he hook me up with his contact info.

Later I found out Tomek was also doing some of the artwork for the new edition of Warzone and Mutant Chronicles (which kinda kicked my inner-goober into overdrive as Mutant Chronicles is one of my favorite gaming settings). So a couple of emails later, he agreed to do some artwork for Onyx Path.

To the left you can see the final Kitsune Iconic. We had to go through a lot of changes for this piece as I was not nearly as "informed" as I thought I was about the Kitsune, thus the infamous super beefy Kitsune was born (I wish I knew where that version was, but alas it is no where to be found).

Kitsune Forms final by Tomek Tworek.

Kitsune Forms sketches.

Artwork and Sketches
by Jeff “El Jefe” Holt.

ART NOTES — Blessing the Blade (Level One)—The sorcerer calls on a local spirit to inhabit a blade for afinite time to enhance it with supernatural power. If prepared in advance, special wrappings restrain the spirit until the bearer speaks an enemy’s name. Only one such weapon may be carried at a time. This Gift is taught by a firespirit.

System: The player spends one Gnosis point. The weapon does aggravated damage for one scene only.

Mokole

For a lot of people, Mokole are pretty much just “weregators” or “werecrocodiles”. When I put together the notes for the Mokole, I wanted to break out of that and showcase how awesome they could be. Hence, the iconic artwork is more of a “weredragon” or “weredinosaur”. Once again, I went with Tomek Tworek as he could give them a more realistic spin yet keep the “holy shit that’s a weredragon” I was going for.

This was actually the first piece he turned in and from then on I kinda just let him go nuts and paint some really awesome pieces.

And yes, the sketch does have two heads.

The Mokole Forms by Tomek Tworek. Yep, the “weregator” is back... although I did have him dragon up the Archid form a tad.

Mokole Memory by James Denton. A modern city scape flowing into the ancient city scape symbolizes the span of a Mokole's memories across the centuries.

I kinda felt bad giving this to any artist as it was going to require an endless amount of iteration to get the point across. Luckily, James nailed it the first time out.

Nagah

The first time I ever saw Mark Nelson's artwork was in a Hellraiser comic back in the early 90s. I was (and still am) in awe of his line work. But the artwork I was truly impressed with were his pieces for Armageddon by Myrmidon Press way back in 1998 (I think I still have that book around here somewhere).

Many years later (like seven I think) I had the opportunity to work with Mark on World of Darkness: Mysterious Places and ever since then I would always ping him whenever artwork that might suit his style comes along, including several cards from my run on Vampire the Eternal Struggle.

In 2012, I finally got the opportunity to work with Mark again in Changing Breeds. From the outset, I knew which Fera I wanted Mark to illustrate, the Nagah and the Camazotz. Both of those worked well with Mark's style and preferred subject matter and I couldn't be happier with the results.

Naga Forms by Mark Nelson.

Naga Assassin final for the War of Rage section by Tyler Windham.

ART NOTES — Show a Nagah assassin stalking and killing a king from ancient times...think places like Rome, Egypt, Babylon, etc.

The Nagah had a far more obvious and direct function, but kept it a carefully guarded secret. They watched the other shapeshifters and, using either their own knowledge or observations gained from the Corax and the Camazotz, assassinated any shapeshifter or human who worked against Gaia's interests. In order to keep up this function, the Nagah hid in plain sight as dancers, scholars, and harmless eccentrics.

Naga Assassin sketch.

I had Mark go with a human template, mainly to break up the streak of splats done in “Battle Form”.

ART NOTES – Weresnakes tend to come from throughout Asia, including the Indian subcontinent, so that’s our main draw of ethnicities—though they’re world-wide so we can have outliers. In human form, Nagah go for nondescript: they kill other shapeshifters and enemies of Gaia, and are pretty much myths to the other Changing Breeds. Most of them prefer close up work with blades and poison. Notable that their near-human form is scaly and has snake-fangs, and their crinos-equivalent is a big hooded serpent with flexible arms. In crinos through to snake forms each Nagah goes for distinctive tattoos.

Another piece from the talented Mr. Trabbold.

ART NOTES – Constrict: The Nagah must be in either Azhi Dahaka or Kali Dahaka, and cannot move while constricting an opponent in her coils. On each action after having caught the victim, the Nagah's player reflexively rolls Strength + Brawl against a difficulty of the trapped victim's (Strength + Brawl – 2, maximum 9). Success inflicts the Nagah's Strength as bashing damage, while failure frees the victim. The Nagah can attack his trapped victim with teeth or claws at 1 difficulty; for others, attacking a constricted victim without harming the Nagah inflicts a +1 difficulty penalty.

Usable in: Azhi Dahaka–Kali Dahaka

Roll: Dexterity + Brawl Difficulty: 6

Damage: Strength Actions: 1

Nuwisha

Changing Breeds was the first Onyx Path publication Chris Bivins's artwork appeared in. I had encountered his artwork a year earlier in Ghost Towns from Pinnacle Entertainment. His work had a nice mix of painting and linework which I thought would work well for Werewolf.

I gave Chris two sections, the Nuwisha and the Grondr (which you'll see further into the book). Below are the notes for the "splat" piece... which he took some liberties with but still worked out in the end.

ART NOTES — 1. Nuwisha/Werecoyote Iconic/Template

This is a quick explanation from the dev of what the Nuwisha are: The children of the trickster god. I'd like to avoid the campy "tricks for the sake of tricks" that was the Nuwisha hallmark for so very long. These guys are Loki handing over a mistletoe dart to throw at Baldur for the lulz, they're Anonymous as werecoyotes. They're also not very subtle—why bother with a whoopee cushion when you could use dynamite? Physically they're usually North or Central American, with a distinct proportion of Native Americans. They tend to dress in whatever survives walking from place to place but each one has this gleam in her eye, like they're sharing a joke with the reader even though they've just suffocated the staff of an oil company because of an "uncontrollable spill".

As far as the character goes, we'd like this one to be a native american female in the homid (human) form.

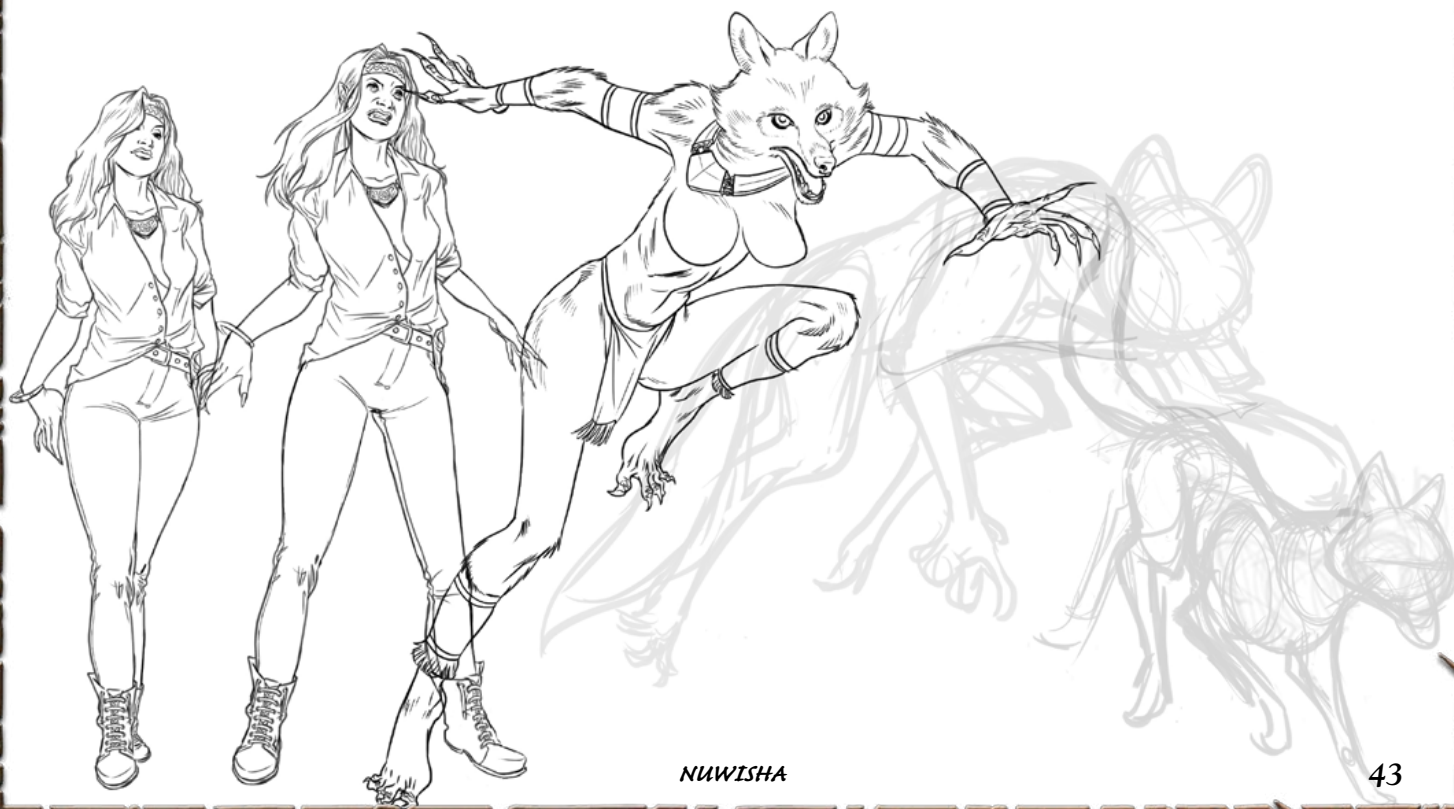

ART NOTES – Homid (human Form)

Tsitsu: Nuwisha gain several inches in height ten to twenty pounds of muscle, but otherwise still looks relatively human. This form is considerably less hairy than a Garou's glabro form and werecoyotes in this form have little difficulty speaking.

Manabozho: In this form, Nuwisha stand almost eight feet tall and gain two and a half times their homid mass. They can still speak human languages in this form, but in a voice that is deep and gravelly. This form inflicts limited Delirium; move any witnesses two levels "up" on the Delirium chart.

Sendeh: Resembling the nearly extinct red wolf, the Sendeh form appears to be a smaller version of the Garou's Hispo form. Nuwisha cannot speak in this form but they can mimic other sounds, including laughter, screams and the cries of other animals.

Latrani: The Latrani form appears to be an ordinary coyote and is the natural form of the latrani breed.

Ratkin

When it was time to approach the Ratkin, I opted to have the iconic piece veer more towards “creepy” rather than “heroic”. That was the main reason for opting to have Doug Stambaugh illustrate the Tunnel Runner aspect rather than a warrior or mystic type. Okay, rats also creep the living hell out of me and I figure why not run with that.

ARTNOTES – Tunnel Runner: The Runners are messengers, scouts, and spies. They know the Rite of the Bolthole as well as many secret methods of traveling from city to city. The Tunnel Runners also have the most contact with Bone Gnawers and Nosferatu vampires and may strike up pacts of friendship with either (although usually not both). Tunnel Runners possess the following abilities. Tunnel Runners have the following Strengths & Weaknesses:

Ratkin Warrior from the expanded content for the Ahadi and Africa. Since the original Ratkin pieces were all done as “creepy” pieces, I figured maybe going a little more heroic couldn’t hurt.

Ratkin from the Hengeyokai section. Rather than show Ratkin ninjas, I had Jeff tackle the Ratkin of Vietnam.

Rokea

It's no secret that I have been a big Jeff Rebner fan ever since he worked on the Valkenburg Foundation. His insane comic book style artwork was an inspiration in my early days as an aspiring artist.

The Rokea were the first thing I contracted out when I started art directing this book and the first artist (hell, the only artist) I contacted about tackling them was Jeff Rebner. Why? The man paints some badass looking weresharks is why. Sweet Jesus... just look at this thing.

Unfortunately, Jeff couldn't commit to any other of the fera due to his regular job as a storyboard artist on American Dad (watch the Rapture's Delight Episode and you will see some of Jeff's stuff).

ART NOTES – From the Dev: Major change in scenery here, as most of the Rokea pieces should be underwater. Most characters will be in Squamus or Chasmus form (man-eating shark and giant bastard nightmare shark, respectively). A piece or two depicting Rokea on land, but they're the exception. In human form,

Rokea are ugly. Lumpy, misshapen features, a rough amalgamation of the first few people they see. Mostly, we're seeing underwater action, which can include devouring divers protecting a toxic dumping site, devouring people who haven't capped an oil spill, and devouring twisted underwater Wyrms-creatures. They're brutal and violent and really rather simple even when they leave water: if they see a problem, they shift into a form with horrific razor jaws and they eat it until it stops being a problem

Great Barrier Reef piece by Jeff "El Jaffe" Holt.

Rokea Forms by Jeff Rebner. These pieces make me want to get Jeff to do an entire book of color wereshark artwork.

Lost Breeds

It is always important that when you write up art notes for an artist (or an art director) that you be specific as possible. The main reason is that while an artist will do research into the subject matter for an assignment, they are not mind readers and don't know your original intent.

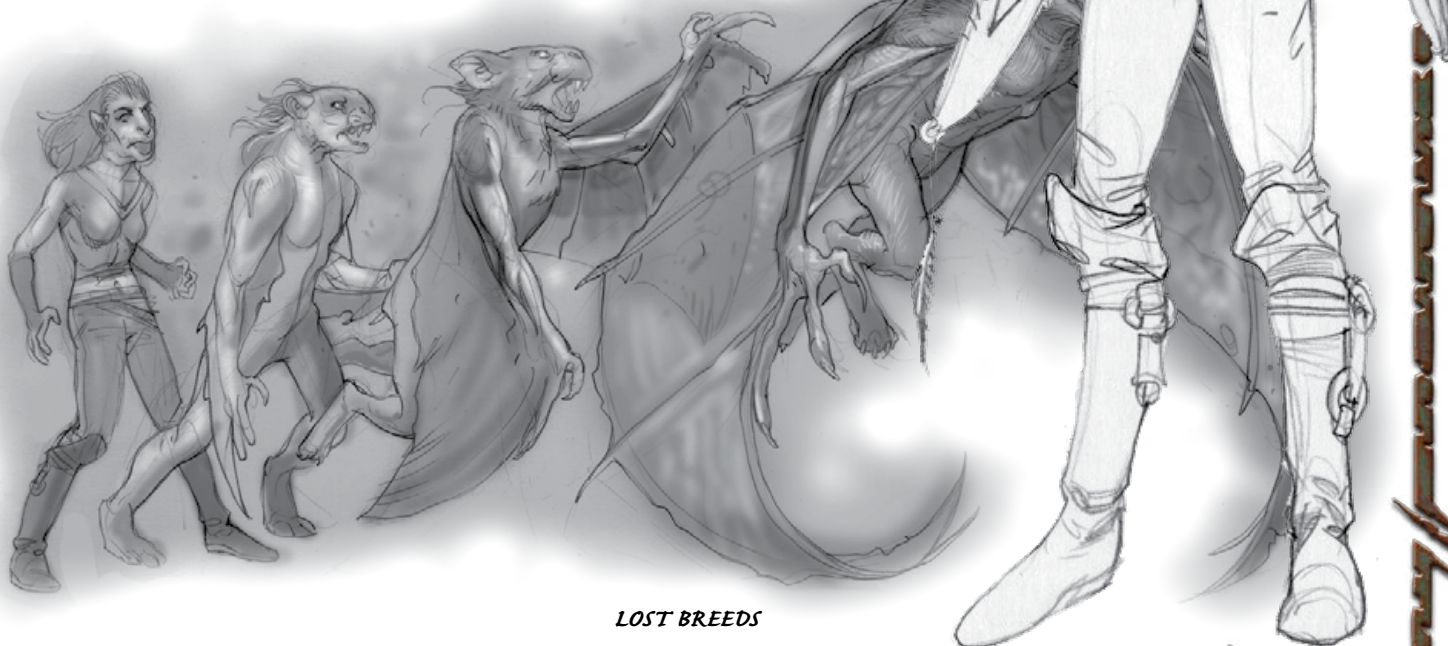

In the case of the Apis (revised version pictured left), the artist did an internet search for photo reference for an Auroch and used the images from that search as the basis for the infamous "Werebuffalo". In this case, a weblink with the intended look would have probably gone a long, long way on this one.

Since then, I've had developers to list actual reference materials or images rather than leaving things up to chance. Yes, it does restrict the artist's freedom a bit, but in the long run it works out best for everyone involved.

Apis 2.0 by Chris Bivins. Chris was a good sport about the whole "Werebuffalo" thing and even fixed up the final months after he turned it in.

Camazotz forms by Mark Nelson. So happy Mark stayed away from the "Man-Bat" look. Only regret was not getting him to work in some Mayan styled jewelry on the human and final "bat-form".

LOST BREEDS

The Grondr Iconic and Forms by Doug Stambaugh. Originally when I contracted this book, Doug only had time to work on the Ratkin.

However, as things ran a little late on the writing end and art notes side of things, Doug's schedule opened up and he was able to also take on the Grondr.

Really happy with the way these came out as it would have been easy to veer into "Bebop" territory with the battle-form Grondr. Luckily, Doug kept him looking hunched and feral.

My favorite has to be the angry Boar form on the far left.

The Zong-Lung from the Hengeyokai section. Originally, we were going to go with the “Dragon” looking version, but as we’d pretty much done that in the Mokole section I had Brian go with the giant Wereturtle.

Some of Brian’s sketches included versions with various martial arts weapons... which I will not show here due to trademark concerns... but I’m pretty sure you know what I’m talking about.
